A HERO FOR TOMMY

TOMMY loved the poor little doggie when he first set eyes on him. Those long, shaggy ears and the sorrowful eyes just begged through the cage to be taken home.

"Oh, mother . . . daddy! Could I have that one, please?"

"We came here to get you a dog, Tommy," his father said. "I guess you can have any one you want."

"Oh, that one then. Look at him . . . the little thing knows me already."

And indeed it really did seem like the dog had picked Tommy out for his master instead of the other way around. The pup was taken out of his cage, and Tommy held him in his arms carefully. Once the puppy looked up into Tommy's face and affectionately licked his cheek. Tommy's heart was completely lost.

"What are you going to call him?" his mother asked when they got home.

"Gee, I hadn't even thought of that," Tommy said wondering. "One thing sure . . . it's not going to be any sissy name." He looked at the dog again, thinking very hard. "I just don't know, Mom," he finally said.

"Well, we just won't call him anything until you decide what you want, Tommy," Mrs. Arthur smiled. "I guess it won't make any difference if you take a few days to make up your mind."

Mrs. Arthur was just in the middle of preparing breakfast the next morning when the front doorbell rang.

"Oh, hello there, Mrs. Barker," she said surprised, to her neighbor across the street. "What brings you calling so early?"

Mrs. Barker certainly didn't look happy about her answer. She held up two uprooted plants in her hands and showed them to Mrs. Arthur. "Look at this," she said sternly. "It's that dog of yours, that's who did it."

Tommy's mother looked confused, and then invited her neighbor inside. "Suppose we just talk about it, Mrs. Barker. I don't think our little puppy . . . "

"I saw him, I tell you," Mrs. Barker replied. "Early this morning he was out in my garden digging up all my plants." And when she saw the doubtful look on Mrs. Arthur's face, she said, "Where is Tommy and the puppy? I'll bet there are still traces of mud on that dog's paws where he's been in my garden."

"Tommy took him out for a walk early, and . . ." and right away, Mrs. Arthur realized she'd made a mistake. "But that doesn't mean . . ." she tried to explain. But she didn't get much farther, because just at that moment, Tommy walked through the back door with the puppy in his arms, laughing and playing.

He heard his mother call him from the living room, and walked in to her.

"Mrs. Barker says the puppy uprooted her beautiful plants this morning, Tommy," his mother looked at him seriously. "Is that true?"

"Oh, no, mother . . . Mrs. Barker. It isn't true at all. Why, I was watching him all the time. Honest . . . he didn't go near your garden."

"I saw that puppy, Tommy." Mrs. Barker told him.

"Maybe it was another one!"

"Humph," Mrs. Barker gathered up her uprooted plants and walked toward the front door again. "I won't report the puppy to the law this time," she said as she left. "But I expect you to get rid of him right away. If that dog is going to cause any more property damage . . ." and the rest of her words were muffled by the door slamming.

Tommy's mother turned to him silently. "Is it true, Tommy?" she asked. "Did the puppy tear up Mrs. Barker's garden?"

"No . . . honest, mother. I was watching him every minute." His eyes almost filled with tears. "Say we won't have to give him up . . . please!"

"We'll wait until your father comes home," was Mrs. Arthur's final decision.

The day was the longest Tommy had ever spent. He fed the dog and cared for it. He took it outside a lot that day, but they only played around the back yard. Each minute they were together made it harder for Tommy to believe that they could ever be separated again. He took the dog in his arms.

"If you could only talk, pup," he said again and again. "I know you didn't do it, but nobody believes me because they think I'm only saying it because I want to keep you."

The dog licked Tommy's cheek. Somehow, Tommy knew that he understood at least some of what was going on and wanted to do something to help.

Finally Tommy couldn't stand the thought of being separated from the dog. He bent down and whispered in the puppy's ear, "We're going to run away, pal . . . both of us. I'll take care of you and nobody will ever say you're a bad dog again."

He picked his pet up and tiptoed into the house. He made his way up the stairs to his room and put some clothes in a little bag he had. He went back down then to the kitchen and made some sandwiches for himself and took a couple of bones for the dog.

"And when we go away," Tommy whispered to the brown, furry puppy, "I'll have time to think of a real good name for you."

Without thinking, his steps led him across the street and down an alley. He didn't see the black dog peeking out at them from behind some steps, but the puppy saw. With a bound, Tommy's pet had leaped out of his arms and his short little legs were carrying him in the direction of the black mongrel.

"Puppy . . . come back," Tommy shouted. "Come here!" But the puppy didn't hear. The black dog started to run, but Tommy's dog was following close behind, his long ears blowing out behind him. His sharp little bark was like a command to Tommy to follow, and Tommy needed no urging.

Down the alley they ran, and around the corner . . . the black dog, the puppy, and Tommy, trying his best not to drop the suitcase or sandwiches.

The large dog soon outran the puppy, and for a moment, disappeared from view around the corner. At that moment, Tommy caught up with his little dog and grabbed him up in his arms.

"I called you to stop," he scolded the puppy. "Why did you run away?" And then a doubt crossed Tommy's mind. He thought to himself, "If my dog didn't mind me this time . . . maybe it's possible that Mrs. Barker was right about him being so naughty!"

"Why were you chasing that other dog?" Tommy asked . . . almost expecting the dog to answer him. "I wonder why . . ." and in the middle of his thought, Tommy stepped to the corner and looked around the building there. Sure enough, the big black dog had thought he was safe now and had strolled onto Mrs. Barker's lawn. Tommy could see the garden from where he stood and just waited, almost knowing what he was going to see next.

The black dog looked around and sniffed the air warily, then ran right to the place where Mrs. Barker had said all her plants were dug up. He pawed a few times, then set to work in earnest digging furiously around the garden.

Tommy looked around hurriedly, and there behind him stood Mrs. Barker, just on her way home from the store.

"Tommy Arthur . . ." she snapped.

Tommy stopped her in a second by putting his fingers to his pursed lips and pointing with his free hand around the corner.

Mrs. Barker stepped around and looked . . . and just in time to see that big black dog, with the dirt of her own garden flying out between his paws.

"Why, it wasn't your . . ."

"No, ma'am!" Tommy said finally. "It sure wasn't my dog!"

Just then, the black dog's head emerged victoriously from the broken plants, with a great big bone between his jaws. He shook the dirt off and ran away from the scene of his crime, darted behind the fence and was gone.

There was a little pause, and then Mrs. Barker turned to Tommy. "I'm really sorry, lad," she apologized. "I thought I was sure."

"Oh, that's all right, Mrs. Barker," Tommy said, "My little puppy here found the real criminal all by himself. Didn't you, little hero?"

Then he burst right out laughing. "That's what I'll call him . . . Hero!" and he ruffled up the little puppy's ears with pleasure.

"That's a fine name, Tommy," Mrs. Barker said. "Hero!"

Tommy picked up all his packages and this time turned toward his own house on the corner. "C'mon," he shouted over his shoulder to the little puppy marching happily behind him.

"Let's go home, Hero!"
